Dr. Robert Raymond

There is no generic English Language Learner (ELL). So, who are they? And how can teachers accommodate their linguistic needs to insure equity and inclusion in their classrooms and school? This session will provide an account of the heterogeneity in the linguistic abilities observable among ELLs including a discussion of why we can’t simply assume that because they’re in the mainstream, they will eventually develop academic language proficiency. That is, effective teaching for first language, English-speaking students isn’t good pedagogy for all. This will be followed by some examples of teaching strategies teachers can employ, as well as an introduction to a number of resources for planning instruction for ELLs by well-respected English-as-second-language and bilingual educators. |

Dr. Marc Markell
Teachers and administrators often ask the question, “Why are boys behaving the way they do?” The way boys behave is part of the typical conditioning and socializing of boys and men. Males are often taught to be violent and lack a range of emotions. This presentation will address what teachers can do to help boys behave in a healthier and less violent manner. |
| How to balance teaching and our personal lives: Is it possible for you to be REALLY stress-free?
9:40 only
Atwood : Voyager South
Dr. Jane Minnema
Come to this interactive session where we will be pondering the fine art of creating a healthy balance between work, family, and personal time. How do we best cope with the stress of managing the challenges of each arena of our life? In part, the secret is "being present" in our daily school routine as we strive to model a stress-free lifestyle for our students, family members, and friends. We will think together to answer these questions as well as other interesting questions that you bring to our session. |
